Visiting Chicago's Ethnic Neighborhoods

Revolving around the intersection of Cermak and Wentworth Avenues, Chicago's Chinatown is one of the nation's largest ethnic-Chinese neighborhoods. Chinatown wasn't always located in this spot, though. Looking to escape the rampant discrimination and anti-Chinese riots on the west coast, Chinese immigrants first arrived in Chicago in 1870 after the transcontinental railroad was completed. Settling around the area of Clark and Van Buren, these new Chicagoans were quick to set up shop. 16 Chinese-owned businesses were located along the two-block stretch by 1889, including eight grocery stores, two butcher shops, and a restaurant. Discrimination and rising rents forced the bulk of these Chinese settlers to move south to the current location of Chinatown in the early 1900s. Since then, the neighborhood, with its restaurants, shops, Chinese-inspired architecture, landmarks, and other amenities that cater to those interested in the Chinese culture, has been a destination for new immigrants, locals, and tourists alike.

Although this was originally a port of entry for Irish and German immigrants in the 1800s, it wasn't until the second wave of immigrants, a majority of them Czech, that Pilsen received its name. These new residents named the neighborhood after Plzen, one of the largest cities in the modern-day Czech Republic, and from the neo-bohemian baroque style architecture to the numerous ornate and fascinating churches, they immediately began putting their "Old World" stamp on the area.

Pilsen remained a predominantly Eastern European neighborhood until 1960s, when, displaced by the construction of the University of Illinois at Chicago campus, a sizeable Mexican population drifted south to the neighborhood. Mexican-Americans have dominated the area since this time, and the neighborhood, with its countless number of Mexican restaurants, grocers, bakeries, and shops, as well as the National Museum of Mexican Art, has grown into one Chicago's centers of Mexican culture.
